Putting No.1 First

What have you done this week about your Continuing Professional Development? Have you promoted your own or your teams' achievements outside of the department? What professional activities are you involved in outside of your work? What are you doing now in your job that you weren't doing three months ago? When did you last look at or revise your CV? Where do you see your future?

Questions, questions, questions!

As recruiters we often see people who are what my old headmaster Bernie (to us) Brown would have said were "wallowing in a slough of iniquity". I was never quite sure what it meant back then but I knew it wasn't good. I think the modern equivalent might be something along the lines of "not pulling out the proverbial finger".

We cannot sit back and expect things to come to us. The modern way of education and development at work very much encourages us to take care of our own development. We must grasp the mettle and get things moving. Perhaps your appraisal is due. What are you planning to say to your line manager about your development? Have you investigated what the organisation you work for offers in the way of Continuing Professional Development? An example here from the University of Bradford:

"There is a strong link between the development of staff and the University's overall success. It is important therefore that the University supports you in your development.

The Staff Development Team aims to provide a wide range of opportunities for staff and postgraduate students, details of which can be found on this Web site. Our learning events are designed to help you develop your knowledge and skills in support of your current role, or to prepare you for a future role.

We encourage you to make use of the opportunities available. In doing so you will undoubtedly increase the value of your contribution to the success of the University, helping us all to meet the increasing challenges faced within the higher education sector.

- Statutory / Essential (i.e. staff development / training that is required by legislation, or is a condition of employment, or is compulsory for a specific role)
- Encouraged (i.e. explicitly linked to the achievement of agreed objectives, for which resources will be prioritised)
- Personal preference (Staff Development activities chosen by individuals that may take place in work time or outside, and may be fully or only partly funded by the University)"

I particularly like the sentence that acknowledges that if you do attend to your CPD you will increase the value of your contribution to the success of the organisation. I would add that you will increase your own sense of self-worth and esteem, your marketability and your value to the outside world and perhaps encourage your colleagues to grasp the CPD mettle as well.

If you are doing something for yourself make sure that you let the people who matter know. If it is work related in any way record it. This is no time to hide your light under a bushel.
